

Abstract of the Disclosure

Body-surface temperatures are measured in order to obtain information about the dissipation of heat from a body surface and information about blood flow volume. Certain parameters are calculated from the measured temperatures, blood flow volume, and constants related to hemoglobin concentration and hemoglobin oxygen saturation. The parameters are applied to a relationship between predetermined parameters and blood sugar levels to obtain a blood sugar level.